The Southern White-faced Scops-Owl Otus leucotis, although superficially similar to the African Scops-Owl, is much larger and has orange – not lemon-yellow – eyes. It also conceals itself well during the day, but by no means as effectively as the African Scops-Owl. Its prey comprises mainly rodents, supplemented by arthropods and occasional birds. Its call is a series of rapid bubbling hoots but, if disturbed at the nest at night, it emits an extraordinary snarling noise and may even attack a human intruder. It lays its eggs in a disused stick nest, often that of a small bird of prey, but also in a tree hollow where several branches converge.
